- The ECB and the Fed will react to political and economic risks by lowering their key rates further. These moves will likely force the SNB to cut interest rates by next spring.
- As we expect the SNB to trail the ECB, the EURCHF is likely to move sideways in the medium term. However, a temporary appreciation of the franc remains possible. In economically uncertain times, investors flock to the safe haven Swiss currency.
- If central banks are able to prevent a recession, key rates should rise again at some point. But higher interest rates are far in the future, so bond yields in coming quarters will only rise slightly or even move sideways.

The cooling of the global economy and the escalation of the US-China trade conflict have forced central banks to reverse course. Last December the Fed was speaking of more interest rate hikes, but it lowered key interest rates already three times this year. They now stand between the range of 1.5 -1.75% (Fig. 1).

A similar development took place at the ECB. At the end of last year, it was pointing to a potential first interest rate hike this year. But faced with disappointing economic data in the spring, it reacted in September by lowering key interest rates 10 basis points to -0.5% and resuming its bond purchase program.

Global interest rate cuts are a double-edged sword

This round of expansionary policy has been a double-edged sword for Switzerland. On the one hand, the Fed and the ECB are supporting the global economy through it, which benefits the Swiss export industry and results in more stable domestic growth. On the other hand, a further decline in global interest rates narrows the interest rate differential between the Swiss franc and other currencies, making the franc more attractive to international investors. This can lead to franc appreciation at a time marked by political and economic risks.

Since April, the Swiss franc has been rising against the euro. Since August, EURCHF was trading around 1.10 (Fig. 2), a level concerning to the Swiss National Bank (SNB). It has reacted to the franc strengthening by intervening in currency markets. In July and August, its foreign exchange market reserves rose by more than CHF 13bn (Fig. 3).

The upward pressure on the franc halted in September. EURCHF leveled off at 1.09, thanks in large measure to the ECB. The package of measures it presented on 12 September disappointed market expectations in certain key areas while exceeding them in others. But its communication of its moves was overshadowed by internal differences, with several countries publicly distancing themselves from what they considered overly expansionary monetary policy.

As a result, the franc did not appreciate, and the SNB at its September meeting did not feel compelled to trim its policy rate further, despite the US and the Eurozone rate cuts. The SNB could have played it safe and lowered its interest rates preventatively. But any such benefit derived is offset by the collateral damage caused by the negative interest rates, to banks, pension funds and private savers, for example. The SNB has to weigh export-oriented and domestic-oriented interests, and in this case franc appreciation, in its view, has not been steep enough to change this cost-benefit balance in favor of a rate cut.

Cuts still possible

The risk of even lower SNB policy rates is not gone, though. If the global economy slows as much as we expect, the ECB and the Fed will likely react more decisively, which is why we expect further rate cuts in March. In that case, the SNB would ultimately be forced to drop its rates to -1% to keep the interest rate differential to the euro stable (Fig. 4).

While the short-term focus is on possible rate cuts, the medium to long-term question is whether and when the SNB will succeed in returning interest rates to positive territory. Here the outlook has deteriorated considerably. The ECB now links interest rate hikes directly to the inflation outlook. It is only prepared to raise interest rates if the inflation outlook converges sustainably to a rate of around 2%.

Core inflation today is around 1%, well below this target. In the best-case scenario, the current slowdown is delaying the recovery of the European economy; in the worst-case scenario capacity utilization of the economy is falling again, so inflationary pressure is likely to remain low and, with it, the ECB's willingness to raise interest rates.

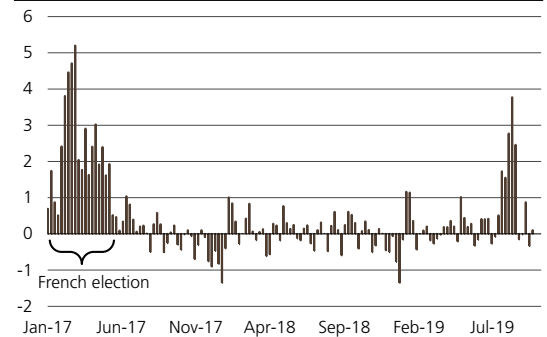

The SNB does not have to follow the ECB's monetary policy step for step, but it will not allow an excessively large deviation for fear of major franc appreciation. So the prospect of positive interest rates in Switzerland remains remote.

Higher exemption threshold relieves banks

In its recent assessment of the situation, the SNB also announced that it would change the basis for calculating the negative interest rates charged. Domestic banks now pay negative interest on the difference between their sight deposits and an exemption threshold. This threshold was previously calculated as 20 times the minimum reserve requirement in autumn 2014. The threshold is now calculated as 25 times the average reserve requirement of the last 36 months. The sight deposits of domestic banks at the SNB currently amount to around CHF 470bn. To date, the exemption threshold has been around CHF 290bn, but with the new regulation it will rise and approach CHF 400bn (Fig. 5).

In taking this step, the SNB also signaled that the negative interest rate environment will continue for a very long time, and it possibly paved the way for further interest rate cuts. Lessening the collateral damage of negative rates on the economy and the banking system will lower the hurdle for a rate cut next March.

Stable franc if the SNB follows the ECB’s lead

The medium-term outlook for the Swiss franc relative to the euro depends on whether the SNB is prepared to emancipate itself from the ECB. Should the SNB decide no longer to follow the ECB’s monetary policy lead, significant Swiss franc appreciation would likely ensue. If it does follow along, as we expect, EURCHF is likely to move sideways in the medium term (Figure 8), because the interest rate differential affecting the currencies will also remain stable.

Even if the SNB does take its policy cues from its larger central bank neighbor, a temporary appreciation of the franc remains possible. In economically uncertain times, investors flock to the safe haven Swiss currency. The same applies when political risks rear their head – especially if the Eurozone is threatened because of a hard Brexit.

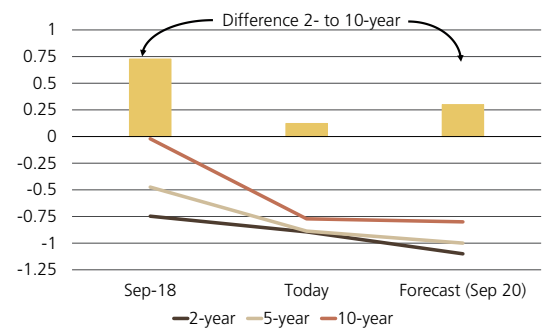

The franc is likely to appreciate against the US dollar, as well, in the medium term. Not only is the US’s interest rate advantage dissolving due to the Fed rate cuts, but the franc is already highly undervalued against the dollar.

Bond yields remain negative

Interest rates on 10-year Swiss government bonds have fallen to unprecedented levels in recent months. On August 15, 10-year interest rates slipped below the -1% mark. A further significant decline is unlikely, in our view. For it to happen, the capital market would have to pencil in much lower key interest rates than today. Although we expect the SNB to cut interest rates once more, we consider it unlikely that they will fall to -1.5 or even -2%.

If central banks are able to prevent a recession, key rates should rise again at some point – not in the short or medium term, but over the longer run. This should be reflected in a rise in long-term bond yields. But higher interest rates are far in the future, so a rise in bond yields in the coming quarters will likely remain modest or a sideways movement might be realized (Chart 6).

Important Information About Sustainable Investing Strategies: Sustainable investing strategies aim to consider and incorporate environmental, social and governance (ESG) factors into investment process and portfolio construction. Strategies across geographies and styles approach ESG analysis and incorporate the findings in a variety of ways. Incorporating ESG factors or Sustainable Investing considerations may inhibit the portfolio manager's ability to participate in certain investment opportunities that otherwise would be consistent with its investment objective and other principal investment strategies. The returns on a portfolio consisting primarily of sustainable investments may be lower or higher than portfolios where ESG factors, exclusions, or other sustainability issues are not considered by the portfolio manager, and the investment opportunities available to such portfolios may differ. Companies may not necessarily meet high performance standards on all aspects of ESG or sustainable investing issues; there is also no guarantee that any company will meet expectations in connection with corporate responsibility, sustainability, and/or impact performance.
