Foreword

We are pleased to introduce the 2026 edition of the Global Investment Returns Yearbook. Each year, the research compiled by Professor Paul Marsh and Dr. Mike Staunton of London Business School, together with Professor Elroy Dimson of Cambridge University, provides an invaluable foundation for understanding the long-term evolution of global financial markets. UBS is proud to continue supporting this authoritative reference, which remains highly relevant for our clients and the broader investment community.

With data stretching back to 1900, the Yearbook offers a unique record of real returns across equities, bonds, bills, currencies – and now gold – helping investors place today's market developments in historical context, offering essential perspective on diversification, asset allocation, and the enduring principles of risk and reward. While the themes dominating recent headlines may feel new, from the extraordinary surge in gold prices to the debate around whether AI could be a technology bubble, the Yearbook reminds us that many of today's dynamics have precedents.

This year's edition is especially timely, with the 2026 Yearbook expanding its analysis in several areas highly relevant to today's market debates. New research examines whether waves of technological innovation – including the rapid advances in AI – have historically led to bubbles, and how such cycles have ultimately affected long-term returns. The dramatic rise in gold prices is also explored through a deeper historical lens, including its evolving role as a potential inflation hedge and safe haven.

Additional work on geopolitical risk highlights when such risks have materially influenced returns, whilst new materials on currency hedging offer long-run evidence on whether and when equity and bond investors benefit from hedging foreign-exchange exposure – an especially relevant topic following recent volatility in major currencies.

We hope the Global Investment Returns Yearbook 2026 will once again serve as an indispensable resource – providing the historical context and analytical depth needed to navigate today's complex environment and to build resilient, long-term portfolios.

Key insights of the report

Introduction

The UBS Global Investment Returns Yearbook offers a comprehensive record of long-term performance across stocks, bonds, bills, currencies, and other asset classes, tracing developments back to 1900. Its purpose is to equip investors with a deep understanding of historical returns—providing context, analysis, and lessons that shed light on today's investment landscape.

At the heart of the Yearbook lies the extensive DMS database (Dimson, Marsh, and Staunton, 2026), which delivers annual return data for equities, bonds, bills, inflation, and currencies across 35 different markets. The scope and accuracy of this dataset have established the Yearbook as the definitive global reference for long-term asset returns.

This UBS Public Summary distills ten of the most important findings from the 126 years of market history explored in the full study.

For information on how to access the complete UBS Global Investment Returns Yearbook, please reach out to your UBS representative. The full report features in-depth chapters on asset returns, inflation, currencies, risk, diversification, factor investing, and return projections, as well as detailed country-by-country data for those analyzing stock, bond, and bill performance across individual markets and regions.

1. The global economy and markets have transformed since 1900

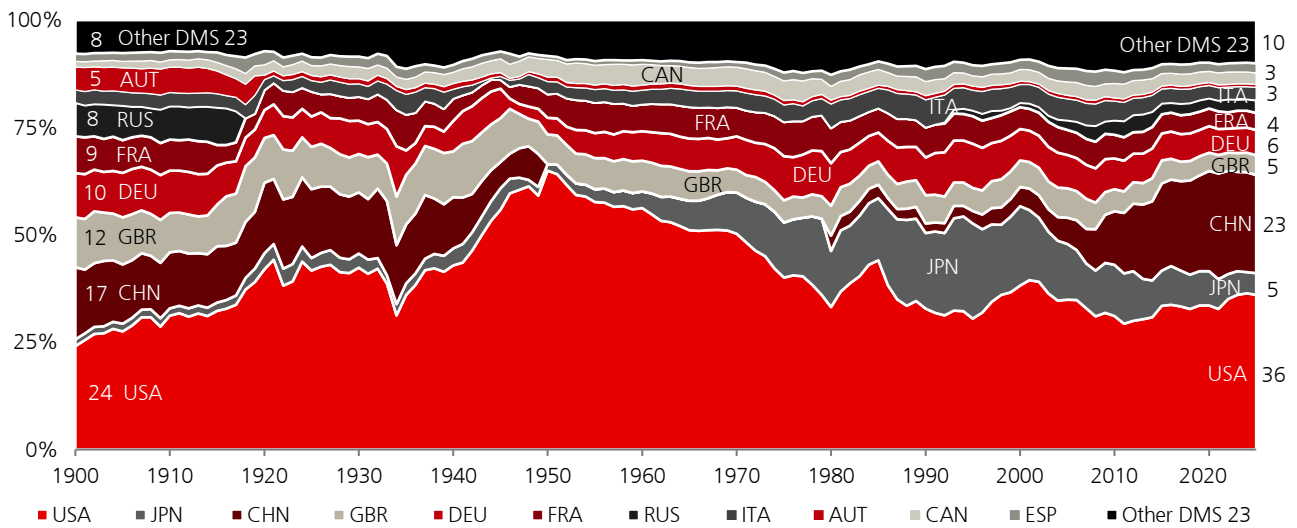

The global economy has altered enormously since 1900, with Figure 8 showing the relative rise and decline of various economies over the period.

The financial market landscape has also transformed. Figure 3 shows that from a relatively evenly distributed global equity market in 1900, the US market now dominates, today accounting for around 62% of total world equity market value, despite its decline in relative GDP share since a peak in the late 1940s. This reflects the substantial returns from US stocks and the large volume of seasoned equity offerings and IPOs.

2. The industry mix has changed a lot too

Of the US firms listed in 1900, some 80% of their value was in industries that are small or extinct today, including railroads, textiles, iron, coal and steel. Meanwhile, 70% of today's companies in the US come from industries that were small or non-existent in 1900. Technology and healthcare were almost totally absent from stock markets in 1900.

Investors often associate new technologies with "bubbles" and periods of subsequent under-performance. However, despite being a declining industry over the period of the study (falling from 63% of the US market in 1900 to less than 1% today, as shown in Figure 9), actually outperformed both the US stock market and their newer technology competitors since 1900.

3. The outperformance of stocks has been striking

Equities have outperformed bonds, bills and inflation since 1900. An initial investment of USD 1 grew to USD 124,854 in nominal terms by end-2025. Long bonds and Treasury bills gave lower returns, although they beat inflation. Their respective index levels at the end of 2025 were USD 284 and USD 69, with the inflation index ending at USD 38.

This outperformance is not just a US phenomenon. The Yearbook shows that equities were the best-performing asset class in all 21 Yearbook countries with continuous investment histories. Meanwhile, bonds beat bills in every country except Portugal. This pattern supports one of the lasting laws of finance—the law of risk and return—and the idea that risk-bearing should carry an expected reward.

4. Developed markets outperformed emerging over the long haul

Comparing developed markets (DM) vs emerging markets (EM) performance over long time periods requires assessing how countries may have been classified at different points in time. Several countries that we today regard as developed would once have been classified as EM, including Finland, Japan, Portugal, and Spain.

Emerging markets tend to be associated with growth and hence are often perceived as offering higher investment rewards. However, we find the annualized return from investing in EM over the period was 6.9% compared with 8.5% from DM, though from 1960 to 2025, their annualized return was 10.9% versus 9.6% from DMs.

Similarly, EM bonds also outperformed until the 1940s, when they plummeted. Thereafter, EM bonds outperformed DM bonds from 1950 to 2025, with the same finding being true for start dates of 1960 and 1980 (though not 1970).

5. Inflation has an important impact on long-term returns

Over long time periods, the impact of inflation is key. Although the US had the third-lowest rate of inflation in the DMS 35 markets, averaging 2.9% per year since 1900, this still means that USD 1 in 1900 had the same purchasing power as USD 38 today.

bonds, real returns tend to be higher when economic growth is higher and inflation is lower. This is an important consideration as investors consider the potential effects of future inflation regimes on asset performance.

Although it is often claimed that equities are a hedge against inflation, we find that for both equities and

6. Gold as a hedge?

Gold is widely perceived as a hedges being a hedge against inflation. However, the relationship between gold and inflation is weak. Of the 28 years in which inflation exceeded 3%, we find that gold returns were negative in 13 of them.

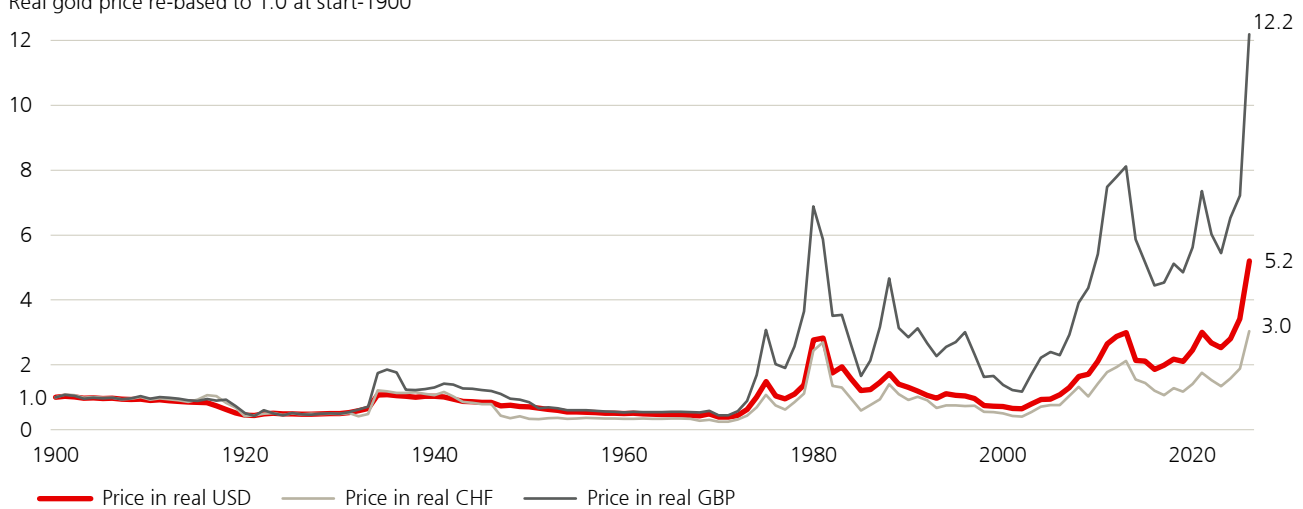

risen 5.2-fold, an annualized return of 1.3%. In the 54 years post Bretton Woods, annualized real gold returns were higher at 4.7% (US), 5.8% (UK) and 4.3% (Switzerland).

Figure 18 shows that gold has been more effective at beating inflation over the long term. The red line shows that since 1900, the real USD gold price has

7. Economic risk has proven more significant than geopolitical risk

In 2025, geopolitics became a central concern for investors, with Figure 41 showing long-run indices of geopolitical risk rising.

Much of the time investors would be correct to “look through the noise” of geopolitics. Using a simple regression of future world equity returns against a geopolitical threat index, we found no relationship, whether we looked a month or a-year ahead.

However, geopolitical risk, whether relating to armed conflict or trade conflict, clearly matters when there are extreme events that have a significant economic impact on major nations. World War I, World War II, and the 1973-74 Oil Shock were geopolitical events that led to three of the six worst episodes for large global equity markets since 1900.

Thankfully, these types of events are relatively rare, economic risk has historically been even more important to investors. Of the four largest peacetime bear markets, three of them were triggered by economic factors, while the 1973-74 stock market crash was activated by geopolitics, but played out as an economic crisis.

8. Diversification is getting more challenging, but still works

Risk can be reduced through diversification, and there are large costs to being under-diversified. Yet, diversification is becoming more challenging. By end-2025, US equity market concentration was at its highest level for at least 100 years, while correlations between DM and EM and between equities and bonds have also risen.

Equity-bond diversification is also likely to help reduce drawdowns. Since 1900, equities and bonds have on several occasions lost more than 70% in real terms, yet a 60:40 equity:bond blend has never declined more than 50%.

Despite the challenges, diversification remains valuable. Figure 62 shows that when currency risk was hedged, investors in the vast majority of markets were better off investing globally rather than domestically.

9. Currency hedging reduces volatility

Institutional investors tend to currency hedge at least part of their portfolios, with generally, non-USD investors tending to hedge more and with higher hedge ratios, and with bond investors hedging more than equity investors.

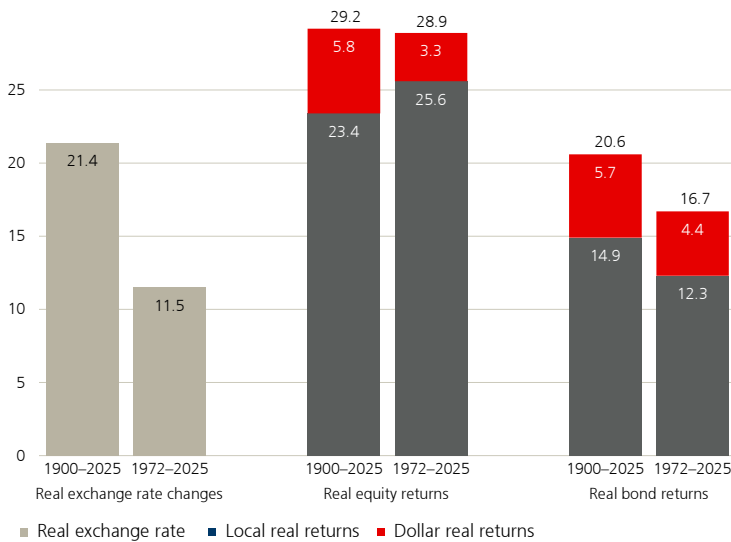

currency risk adds proportionally more to the risk of bond portfolios. This may explain the higher preponderance of hedging for fixed income portfolios.

Is this worthwhile? Figure 36 shows that currency risk on average added around 6 percentage points to total risk whether we focus on equities or bonds, although

10. Investing with style has delivered outperformance

Style investing remains popular as investors seek to enhance their investment returns by taking advantage of premiums uncovered by academic research.

Figure 94 shows that the momentum factor has offered the strongest and most persistent factor performance over the long term. It delivered a factor premium of 7.7% p.a. in the US and in the 24 country-decades in the chart, the momentum premium ranked top in 13 of them.

Factor investing can also sometimes deliver disappointing results. We note that 22% of the country-decades saw negative premiums, even over entire decades.

Navigating the future

"What's past is prologue", a quote from The Tempest by William Shakespeare, is engraved on the National Archives Museum in Washington, DC, as a reminder that history sets the context for the present. Perhaps the most apposite advice for today's turbulent world comes from David McCullough, the American popular historian and author, "History is a guide to navigation in perilous times".

We hope the guidance in this Summary and the full Yearbook provides a valuable compass for navigating today's uncertain markets, helping you make informed decisions and build more resilient portfolios for the future.
