How companies can adapt to the evolving workplace
The traditional work environment is now something of the past. COVID-19 has upended expectations of what a typical work environment should look like for both employees and employers.
Employers have adjusted to the needs of their employees in numerous ways, but more work remains to retain top talent and ensure businesses can thrive. While the pandemic has set the work environment on a new path, it is still shifting and companies need to stay nimble.

Most employees will remain in their preferred work environments post-COVID-19
As a sense of security returns, 85% of employees will opt to work in their preferred environment, whether in-person, remote or hybrid. About half of employees will resume working in-person, while another 38% will remain remote or hybrid. Employees whose work environment preferences are not aligned with employer expectations are major flight risks: Seven in 10 will leave.

Employers are adapting to a more mobile workforce
Receptive to the fact that many employees want the flexibility to live and work where they choose, seven in 10 companies are allowing employees to move to new locations and continue working remotely. However, employee salaries are being adjusted to compensate for this flexibility—most by at least 15%.

Employees lack awareness of full benefits
Employers went to great lengths to support employees during the pandemic by adding many new benefits, but communication of these benefits can be improved. Employees are aware of the more traditional benefits such as COVID-19 testing and flexible work schedules, but don’t notice many of the nontraditional ones such as childcare resources and reimbursement for home office equipment.

Employees value yet remain unaware of Diversity, Equity & Inclusive (DE&I) efforts
While employers have increased DE&I efforts over the last few years, they may be overestimating the extent to which employees are aware of them. Sixty-three percent of companies feel their employees are highly aware of such efforts, yet only 45% of employees agree. Half of employees wish their companies would do more to promote DE&I efforts.

Employees are looking to employers for retirement planning needs
Access to retirement plans is a major factor when choosing a new job or remaining in a current one. Despite this fact, one-third of companies don’t offer this benefit. More than 80% of employees feel companies should be doing more to help employees reach their retirement goals.

Equity plan participants want help managing their awards
Many equity plan participants are worried about mismanaging their awards. Three in four are highly concerned they could be doing more to maximize their wealth potential. Most equity plan participants are highly open to tools to help minimize tax strategies, track progress toward financial goals and automatically diversify their awards into traditional investing accounts.
Employers made significant workplace adjustments during the pandemic

With the traditional work environment knocked off its axis, nearly all employers have adjusted work schedules, hiring and retention practices, and the types of benefits they offer. More than half increased starting salaries to attract new employees, while 45% increased pay to retain top talent. One-third increased benefits offered to accommodate remote employees.

Almost all employers adjusted workplace policies during the pandemic … … with a focus on recruiting, retention and work-life balance

- Work schedules: 91%
- Hiring practices: 87%
- Pay structure: 85%
- Retention practices: 84%
- Types of benefits offered: 83%

- Increased starting salaries to attract new employees: 53%
- Increased pay / bonuses of existing employees: 45%
- Offered more benefits to accommodate work-from-home arrangements: 36%
Most employees will remain in their preferred work environment

Once the dust settles and COVID-19 becomes a part of everyday life, most employees will opt for their preferred work environment. About half will continue to work mostly in person, while 38% will remain remote or hybrid. While three in four employees are highly confident in their job security, 61% feel confident they could find another job to their liking—what many have termed the “Great Resignation.” Men are more confident than women about their job prospects.

Many employers are adapting to a more mobile workforce

Recognizing that many employees want to remain fully remote, seven in 10 employers are allowing employees to relocate to a desired area and continue working remotely. The easing of an in-person policy can have implications for an employee’s salary. Eight in 10 employers are adjusting salaries based on an employee’s chosen location. The majority (64%) of employers are adjusting salaries 15% or more.

High attrition risk for employees not in preferred work environment

Employees will look for career opportunities elsewhere or exit the workforce completely if their expected work environment does not align with their preferred one. In fact, seven in 10 of these employees will leave their jobs, while four in 10 are willing to take a pay cut in order to remain fully remote.

Women are more likely than men to change jobs or take a pay cut in exchange for a more flexible work environment, while men are almost twice as likely as women to retire early.

An awareness gap exists about many benefits

While employers have increased employee benefits in the wake of the pandemic, employees are not fully aware of them. About seven in 10 companies feel their employees are highly aware of the benefits offered. However, despite awareness of access to specific benefits such as COVID-19 testing, flexible work schedules and paid leave, employees do not know about other benefits such as access to childcare resources and reimbursement for home-office equipment.

Employees value but don’t realize DE&I efforts underway

In light of the social turmoil of the last two years, about half of companies have increased their DE&I efforts. Two-thirds of employees deem these efforts highly important, even more so among the younger generations.

Similar to employee benefits, companies may again be overestimating how much information about DE&I initiatives is trickling through to their workforce. Nearly two-thirds of employers feel their employees are highly aware of their DE&I efforts, but only 45% of employees actually are. About half of employees feel their company should be doing more to better promote DE&I efforts across their firms.

Employees value retirement plans when seeking or deciding to stay at a job

Retirement plans factor high for employees when considering a new job opportunity or staying with their current employer. Together with health care benefits and base salary, retirement is one of the top three items employees care about when looking for or staying at a job. Yet almost a third of companies don’t offer this benefit.

Employees expect companies to help them with their retirement goals

Eight in 10 employees feel companies should be doing more to help them reach their retirement goals. Unlike the traditional notion of wanting to retire by a certain age (e.g., 65), employees are more focused on retiring with a certain amount of assets. Across the generations, millennials have the highest expectations for this type of support.

Turning insights into action

The following action steps based on key insights from our research can help you create a more rewarding workplace.

1. Check in with employees
   Workplace benefits are constantly changing and at a more rapid pace than ever before. If you haven’t in the last two years, consider surveying employees now to find out what exactly they really need.

2. Focus on benefits that matter
   When it comes to attracting and retaining talent, certain workplace benefits are at the top of employees’ wish list: base salary, health care benefits and retirement plans. If you already provide access to a retirement plan, consider automating enrollment. If you don’t, consider offering retirement plan access in the future.

3. Get noticed for what you offer
   To attract the right talent for your company, maybe it’s time you start including benefits in new job postings as a way to further distinguish yourself in the marketplace.

4. Increase awareness of new benefits
   The majority of employers added new benefits in the last two years, yet in general fewer than half of all employees are aware of some of them. Examine your benefits communications to see where you can make changes. You could also survey your employees on their preferred method of communication.

5. Publicize DE&I efforts
   Additionally, almost half of employers have increased their DE&I efforts, which is valued by employees, especially the younger generations who make up the majority of today’s workforce. Yet fewer than half of all employees are aware of what their companies are doing in this area. This is another opportunity for you to review your employee communications and their frequency.

6. Help ease the student loan burden
   The government has paused the repayment of student loan debt for the last two years, yet this is still one of the biggest financial challenges facing American workers today. Eighty-four percent of employees across all ages say it’s the number one reason they don’t participate in workplace retirement savings programs.1 Do you know if your employees need assistance with student loan debt? What solutions do you already have in place to assist?

7. Engage employees with equity
   Equity plans overall are being used in unique ways to engage and retain talent. What more could you do with equity awards? If you don’t already, could you expand offering them to all your employees? Could anything be done with the vesting periods for equity awards?
